INTRODUCTION

The condition of minorities in Pakistan, particularly religious minorities, has been of abject misery ever since the inception of the country. While the persecution of religious minorities has always been prevalent in the Pakistani society, there has been an alarming rise in the incidents of discrimination and violence against them in the last one year. Even more alarming is the fact that a majority of these incidents were promulgated by the state of Pakistan itself.

The present report aims at highlighting the dismal population growth, institutionalised discrimination, and lack of opportunities experienced by the religious minorities in Pakistan. These include the Christians, Hindus, Sikhs, Ahmadiyyas, and Shia Muslims. The women and children of these groups are often double victimized by being subjected to violent attacks and forced conversions.

The most blatant proof of the discrimination faced by these minorities can be witnessed in the population figures. In the year 1947, when Pakistan separated from India after the end of British colonialism, the population of minorities was as much as 30% of the total population. Quite unbelievably, the minorities had come down to being just 3.53% of the total population by the year 2017. The public and political space available to the religious minorities in all spheres of their lives has continuously shrunk, magnifying the sense of marginalization, vulnerability and helplessness. The vision with which this country came into being, that of giving a respectable space to the minorities has long been lost. It seems that the white in Pakistan's flag that was supposed to reflect the presence of non-Muslim communities no longer holds much value.

It is no secret that the members of religious minorities in Pakistan have always been treated as second-class citizens. Not just subsequent governments and the population of Pakistan, but the Constitution and the laws are also openly partial towards the Muslim majority.

Forced Conversions

The dual oppression of women of minority communities is perhaps the gravest of problems. Crimes such as abduction, rape, forced conversion and forced marriage are commonplace against these women. Various international and national publications, including one from Aurat Foundation reports that every year, on an average one thousand women belonging to the minority community are forcibly converted to Islam. The most vulnerable of these women belong to the Hindu and Christian communities.

The reports suggest that the actual scale of this problem might be much bigger than is known as a number of cases go unreported, and no legal proceedings are done on it. The local police, more often than not, is hands in glove with the corrupt and partial authorities, who also represent the majority. This acts as a major deterrence against effective filing of cases and complaints of crimes such as sexual harassment, violence and other incidents committed by men of the majority community.

The act of forcibly converting a Hindu to Islamic faith is highly valorised in Pakistan. It is supposed to get one brownie points with Allah. Powerful entities including shrines, local politicians, clerics and organisations are often involved in these conversion nexus. New Muslim converts and their facilitators are offered lucrative gifts including money and properties by the local clerics, part of such a nexus. These acts of forced conversions are perceived by the majority as service to God and spreading of his message.

Blasphemy Laws

The controversial Blasphemy law in Pakistan institutionalizes discrimination against religious minorities by codifying it into a law. The Pakistan Penal Code under Section 295 C criminalizes any act, spoken or written, that defiles the name of the Prophet. Any act of insult or contempt against the Prophet are criminalized under this law. Quite unsurprisingly, the Blasphemy law is often employed to settle personal disputes in the country. Even when the police and other law enforcement agencies intend to remain vigilant and stop any kind of mob violence, they find themselves to be powerless in such situations.

Suicide cases in Sindh

The year 2022 has been particularly bad for the religious minorities of Pakistan, especially for the Hindus living in the Sindh region. A major issue witnessed this year is the high number of suicide cases by the minority community. Rural Sindh is overwhelmed by the sheer number of dead bodies found hanging by the neck on tree branches. A lot of these bodies have been found with visible signs of torture, including rope marks on hands and legs of these people, making it hard to dismiss these cases as that of suicide. The police, however, has been unwilling to investigate these cases as potential murder crimes.

Desecration of Worship Places and Graves

Vandalism of religious places belonging to minority communities is also commonplace. A number of Hindu temples have been destroyed in Pakistan, and the incidents continue to happen year after year. People are equally scared and dismayed by the desecration and illegal encroachments of temples as well as the false promises made by the officials of restoring or rebuilding these temples. There are reports that in certain areas of Pakistan, minorities such as Sikhs are required to pay annual taxation for living in a so-called Muslim land. Other reports tell the stories of Shia men being attacked and abducted from their homes by men of the security forces. It is quite pitiful that even the graves and crematory sites of these minorities are not spared. More than 200 graves belonging to the Ahmadiyyas have been reportedly desecrated in Pakistan. Not even the dead are allowed to rest in peace. These incidences have prompted people of the minority communities to flee both their homes and the country.
